Consumption by Kevin Patterson is a book that is hard to categorize, and that is part of what I liked about it. It does not fit cleanly into any genre, and it is not a cleanly written book. Parts of it are confusing, and some characters and plot lines (there are many, many plot lines) seem superfluous. While everything I've read about the book says that the focus is on the main character ...

[T]he people in Kevin Patterson's gripping new novel of the North, Consumption, are defiantly human. They are complicated, passionate, troubled, confused and, in some cases, doomed -- by disease, by their own failings and by those of their loves ones and by economic and cultural forces beyond their control.
